look after all these students much better than I can alone. I have ^{already} been obliged to refuse to the earnest and repeated requests of a number of last year's students to form a class in Bulgarian and English, as I wish to have more time to help the new students, some of whom are ~~very~~ ^{quite} bright.

Since you left I have received several letters from Mr. P. In some of them he betrayed much anxiety and depression about his condition. I wrote to him frequently in order to keep up his spirit. In his last letter, which I received last Saturday, he looks more calm and hopeful. I am very glad to hear from him that you are trying to make some arrangement for him to stay away for some time, and I earnestly hope you will succeed.

Till the present day, though anxiously awaiting further news about my father, especially a letter from himself, I have been sadly disappointed. I have been looking forward to every mail with high and nervous expectations - yet no letter, no word, nothing whatever to cheer my heart; except a more direct confirmation of the news I had
